come for the few sociologists who read theology to delve into the functional importance of substantive theological issues and of such themes as the sin-salvation dialectic. A third area in which progress in the theological-sociological dialogue can be made is in a much more sophisticated analysis of a basic differentiation-integration dialectic. This would mean that religion is not just treated as a victim of differentiation (as, with few exceptions, most sociologists of religion including Kaufmann seem to do) but by nature and intrinsically as a countervailing and integrating force.
